Fires destry over 2000 homes and apartments, 238 stores and offices, 84 farm buildings, and hundreds of other structures, every day. They cause over 12,000 deaths a year, which approximately 30% of are children. The death toll would reduce greatly if persons were properly trained on how to react to emergency situations caused by fires. However, early detection of fires would help even more.
Most fatal fires occur at night. Smoke and heat detectors are intended to awaken and allow enough time for occupants to escape the burning structure. Many fires have been detected early enough to allow fire companies to put them out with a minimum amount of damage.
Certain conditions can cause false alarms by smoke detectors. False alarms can be attributed to areas of high humidity, dusty conditions and presence of smoke or fumes. Garages kitchens, and furnace rooms are good examples of such areas. Fires that start in these areas are likely to be fast burning and hot. Under these circumstances, a heat detector would be more appropriate.
Heat detectors sense only temperature levels. In other words, it is designed to sound an alarm when there is a rapid rise in the temperature of the room or whenever the temperature reaches some preset level.
For effective results, place smoke detectors on ceilings or walls in areas where there are natural-paths of air movement. Most manufacturers suggest placing detectors 6" - 12" from the ceiling when mounting on a wall. When mounting on the ceiling they should be at least 12" from the wall or corners. Never place them in the corner of a room. Avoid placing detectors on poorly insulated ceilings or outside walls and in front of or above heating or air conditioning duct outlets.
In reference to room location, a smoke detector should be placed in the hall near bedroom doors. An additional detector should be installed at the top of the basement stairs.
Taken the time to test each unit as specified in the instructions supplied with the units. Testing is easy and should be done every 4 - 6 weeks.
A word to the wise—don't be caught without a smoke detector whether your source of heat is electric, gas, wood, etc., or a combination. An early detection of fire may save your life.
